The Last Dragon on Earth

A Timeless Tale of Tolerance and Friendship

For as long as anyone can remember, princes have killed dragons and rescued princesses. But what happens if the princess doesn't need rescuing — and the dragon to be killed is the very last one on Earth?

"Why kill the very last dragon?" asks the Princess. "Gone is gone," she thinks, "and extinct is extinct." The Princess tries to convince her father to waive the dragon-slaying requirement, but the King insists. "If it was good enough for my generation, it's good enough for yours," he says. The Prince and Princess soon learn that the dragon has no interest in having the Princess for brunch. He only wants to be left alone. "But we want to get married!" the prince explains. "How nice for you. I hope you'll be very happy together. Now go away!" growls the dragon irritably. The Prince and the Princess are stumped. "What can we do?" asks the Prince. "Your father said I had to bring him the dragon's head if we're going to get married." "Yes . . ." says the Princess. "But he didn't say it couldn't be attached to the rest of the dragon, did he? Perhaps it's time for a new tradition!"

This modern fairy tale is a wonderful introduction to the concept of species extinction and is brought to life by Crabgrass Puppet Theatre with their trademark blend of beautiful puppets, fabulous scenery full of castles and caves, and hysterically funny action.
